The New Year's celebration in Scotland is called "Hogmanay," and it is on December 31st. The Scottish people have many traditions during the New Year. Many of them date back to hundreds of years ago.

On New Year's Eve, the Scottish people build fires in large barrels(桶) with paper, tar(焦油), and other things in it. Then, they roll the burning barrels through the towns. This is called, "Burning of the Clavie." It has several different meanings. One is that people burn the old year to welcome the new year. The burning barrels symbolize the fire of knowledge. People take what they have learned in the old year into the new year ahead by rolling the Clavie. Another meaning is that people should continue to burn for knowledge to be a better person each year.

The Scottish people have another tradition called "first footing." It is believed that the first person who enters their houses on New Year's Day will bring them good or bad luck. For example, if the visitor has dark hair, the family will be lucky in the coming year. Of course, if the visitor brings a gift, that would be even better.
