For a long time, Jake wanted a dog. However, his father did not like dogs. "You have to take them for walks and they bark too much," his father said. One cold December day, though, Jake saw a dog near a restaurant. The restaurant owner said she sometimes fed the dog because it looked hungry. The animal was dirty, so Jake felt sorry for it and asked the owner if he could take it home. She agreed.

When Jake told his father about the dog, his dad shouted, "You can't keep it!" Jake took the dog outside and gave it some chicken from dinner. Later that night, Jake looked out the front window and saw the dog by the door. Since it was cold outside, Jake opened the door and let it inside. He planned to wake up early and take the dog outside so his father wouldn't be mad. That night, Jake's house caught on fire while the family was sleeping. Because of the fire, the dog started barking loudly, and it woke Jake and his parents. Everyone ran out of the house to safety. After that, Jake's dad let him keep the dog and never got angry about the animal at all, even when it barked.

Habits are things we do over and over again without thinking. They can be good or bad. Good habits are things that improve your life and make your parents proud, such as doing your homework and brushing your teeth every day. Bad habits, on the other hand, are usually not good for you or can bother other people.

Most of us have at least one bad habit. Do you bite your nails or watch too much TV? Or maybe you burp a lot or always pick your nose? Bad habits come in all shapes and sizes, and they are easy to form but hard to break.

However, the good news is that bad habits can be changed. The first thing you need to do is to recognize that a special habit is bad. Does it harm you or others? Does it cost a lot of money? After you decide to break this habit, make a plan. Keep track of your progress and don't get upset if you mess up. Quitting bad habits takes time and effort. As the famous saying goes, "If at first you don't succeed, try and try again."

30. What is the purpose of this article?

- (A) To give people some tips for breaking a bad habit.
- (B) To explain how a good habit can help people succeed.
