Passage 2

Though it is often said, "Seeing is believing," sometimes this is simply not the case. You can't always trust your eyes because what you see may be different from what your brain thinks you see. Your eyes collect information and send it to your brain, which then ___36___ it. Sometimes, your brain has to guess and ___37___ missing details, even creating images that aren't there. These are called optical illusions.

An example of an optical illusion is the Ames room. When an observer looks through a peephole, they see a room in the regular shape of a(n) ___38___. There are two people in the corners of the room. One person appears huge while the other seems very small. When they switch places, the giant becomes tiny, and the tiny person looks huge! How does this happen?

The fact is ___39___ the room isn't a regular shape. It is built with the walls and floor sloping at different angles. Therefore, one corner is actually farther away than the other. This creates a special effect—hiding the room's true shape. This illusion only works when you view the room from one particular ___40___ with just one eye. If you use both eyes, you can tell it's a trick.
